Disneyland: First Visit

A complete sensory-friendly day guide designed for children with autism & sensory needs. This is a short preview built from the first three steps of that guide — the full version includes an hour-by-hour schedule, sensory ratings for every land, staff scripts, and backup plans for the whole day.

1

Pre-visit preparation

Social story + visual schedule (print at home)

Read through a simple social story with your child a few days before your trip — what the day will look like, what a character costume is, what happens if a line is long. Pair it with a printable visual schedule they can hold or check off, so the day has a shape they can predict before you ever leave the house.

2

DAS Pass + arrival strategy

Quiet entry, orientation time, first 2 hrs

Request Disability Access Service in advance so your child gets a return time instead of a standard line wait. Plan for a quiet entry: arrive right at rope drop, but don't head straight for a ride — give your child 10 quiet minutes just to look around and get oriented to the sounds, sights, and space. Treat the first two hours as settling-in time, not ride-count time — the goal is a calm start, not maximum throughput.

3

Sensory break schedule

Quiet zones, feeling check-ins, rest plan

Build rest into the schedule before your child needs it, not after. Know where the nearest quiet zone is at all times, check in on how they're feeling every hour or two using simple language or a feelings scale, and have a low-stimulation backup plan ready for when the day runs long.

A NOTE ON THIS PREVIEW

This download is a short sample, not the full guide — it exists to show you exactly what our full guides look like and how they're built. The complete Disneyland guide (and every other destination guide) includes the full-day schedule, a sensory map, printable scripts, and backup plans for hard moments.
